As is quickly apparent from his vita, Larry's career trajectory has taken a circuitous route. Unlike most graduate students, Larry refused to be mired in the drudgework of teaching introductory philosophy classes, and instead established links with the scientific community, especially the National Center for Atmospheric Research, where he has served as a paid consultant for several years. While this opened up numerous opportunities (the vita clearly reveals a productive mind at work), it delayed the completion of his Ph.D. However, now that Larry is done, he is marvelously equipped to enrich any interdisciplinary research or teaching project that brings together scientists and humanists. Indeed, although I am the editor of an interdisciplinary journal, and thus regularly come into contact with people who claim to be able to bridge C.P. Snow's "Two Cultures," I know of no other person who bridges that gap as authentically as Larry.
